Claiming His Baby Back On

Answer. To claim a baby as a dependent, the baby must have been born alive during the current tax year. If your child wasn't born until the next year, you can't claim the baby as a dependent, even though your pregnancy lasted most of the tax year. However, if your baby was born this year, claiming a newborn on taxes is possible even though the baby wasn't alive most of the year.

Generally, IRS regulations determine who has the right to claim a child as a dependent if the parents of a child divorce, separate or never marry each other. A father who pays child support by agreement or by court order doesn't automatically become eligible to claim his child as a dependent. For the IRS, the main considerations that decide who claims the child is where the child lives and who provides the majority of your child's financial support during the tax year.
