Unlearning is a process of throwing civilized illusions overboard, of cleaning our minds. Rewilding means "to return to a more natural or wild state; the process of undoing domestication" -- to become uncivilized, to reconnect to place. The bottom line is that "without genuine, raw connection to wild nature we, as creatures, go insane."

Miles Olson's Unlearn, Rewild is Thoreau-like in that the author translates philosophy into action, but Olson's book is much more readable than Walden is. On the other hand, a modern audience will probably find Olson more radical than Thoreau, and Olson does have a rose-tinted view of hunter-gatherer cultures (going so far as to posit that rape was virtually unknown in North America before European contact, which seems like a hard fact to prove).

Unlearn, Rewild - Walden Effect

The author of Unlearn, Rewild talks about engaging with the wild earth and why sustainability is not enough.

FOR THE WILD

The crises of cosmological, mythological and psychological disconnection from nature and from each other may drive us to places of darkness and suffering; and yet there is great potential in that darkness to interact with creative energy. Retracing meaning through archetypal myth offers an opportunity to understand the great challenge of our time to heal the planet from its wounds, and to ...
